DALKEY (TOWNSHIP).

DALKEY, a parish and township in Rathdown barony, Dublin county, eight miles S.E. from the General Post Office, Dublin, and two from Kingstown, comprising an area of 601 acres. Population, 1881, 3,329. Rateable valuation of property over £13,970 5s. It is picturesquely situated on the southern shore of Dublin bay, and appears from an early period to have been a town and port of some importance, having had a charter of incorporation, as is on record, by an enrolment of 33 Edw. III. dated 8th Feb., 1358, which styles its corporate officers as the "Provost and Bailiffs of the town of Dalkey," and down to the end of the seventeenth century it maintained the character of a port, and was protected by seven castles, the remains of two of which are still to be seen on each side of the main street. The town comprises one main street with several other streets leading from it. There is a Roman Catholic Church and a Wesleyan Methodist Church. The Protestant Church is a large and elegant building; and not far distant is the Loretto Convent, a handsome cruciform structure. There is a National School, Coast-guard and Metropolitan Police Stations. Dalkey island, comprising an area of twenty-two acres, lies about three furlongs from the mainland. The only buildings on it are a martello tower battery, and ruins of a church, stated to have been dedicated to St. Benedict, and now one of the national monuments vested in the Board of Works. In the end of the last, and beginning of the present century, a convivial Dublin club used to assemble on the island annually in June, and go through all the burlesque form and pomp of a mock coronation of "King of Dalkey," with officers of state, &c. A harbour has been completed, and one of the old castles (which dates from the year 1498), has been restored for the Town Hall. It is connected with an hourly train service to Westland-row, and with Kingstown by a tramway.
